The ABRIDGMENT of a Voyage round the World; by GEORGE ANSON, Eſq; continued from N°. 846 and 849.

THE Engliſh had the firſt account of the miſcarriage of the Spaniſh fleet from a prize; which, as it removed their apprehenſions, ſhewed at the ſame time that they had been but too well grounded. Pizarro had ſent a particular account of his misfortunes to the vice-roy, in which he added, that as the Engliſh had been more venturous, ſo poſſibly they might be more fortunate; but that in this caſe, as they muſt have ſuffered greatly, and could put in only at Juan Fernandez, it was only ſending a few ſhips to wait there for them, which, in their weak condition, might eaſily take and deſtroy them. The Vice-roy accordingly had diſpatched 4 ſhips from Callao, one of 50, two of 40, and one of 20 guns, to intercept the remainder of the Engliſh ſquadron. But after waiting till the 6th of June to no purpoſe, near Conception-Bay, in the iſland of Juan Fernandez, they had ſailed away, being perſuaded that the Engliſh had either given over their enterprize, or had all periſhed; and the Vice Roy, who was of the ſame opinion, diſcharged them at their return, and took off the embargo on the merchant ſhips in his ports.

This news, which not only accounted for the broken pitchers, fiſh-bones, and aſhes, which Mr. Anſon found on his arrival there, but alſo removed all his fears of being overpowered by the enemy, encouraged him to cruiſe with his ſquadron along the coaſt of Chili and Peru. This cruiſe was ſo ſucceſsful that every one of his ſhips took rich prizes, and would have taken more had not the Tryal ſloop been ſo damaged that the time of the paſſage of moſt of the ſhips from Callao to Valpariſio, was loſt in aſſiſting, lightening, and, at length deſtroying that ſloop. In order to facilitate the taking of prizes, by an appearance of ſuperior ſtrength, Mr. Anſon fitted up the ſhips which he took, and ſtationed them in different places, out of ſight of the ſhore. But a veſſel, which, after a long chace, had got clear from the Glouceſter, informed the Governor of Payta that the enemy was on the coaſt; who ſent an account of it to the Vice-Roy, by an expreſs; ſo that, from that time, few Spaniſh ſhips ventured out of harbour. However, the Engliſh fell in with one, juſt come from Payta, which informed them that they had been diſcovered, and gave them a particular account both of the treaſure and forces which were in that place. This immediately determined the Commodore to attempt the taking of it, before the governor could get the treaſure removed farther into the country. To prevent any alarm, Mr. Anſon, as ſoon as night came on, ſent away 3 boats, in which were 58 men, who, favour'd by the darkneſs, and guided by the priſoners, came into the bay undiſcovered; but here they were perceived by a Spaniſh bark, and the people on board, by their outcries, gave the alarm to the inhabitants, who ran together confuſedly, and the fort fired ſeveral times; however the Engliſh having landed at one of the ends of the town, marched along the ſtreets ſhouting (which intimidated their enemies) and dividing themſelves into two bodies, they made themſelves maſters, at the ſame time, of the fort and governor's houſe. The Spaniards being thus ſurprized in the night, leap'd from their beds, and fled with ſuch precipitation as not to ſtay for their cloaths. The governor himſelf left behind him a young bride, to whom he had been married but two days, and who, had it not been for two ſoldiers, leſs expeditious than their commander, who carried her off without a ſhift, muſt have become a priſoner to the conquerors. The Engliſh having, in a quarter of an hour, thus diſpoſſeſt the inhabitants, began to rifle their effects. More whimſical figures can ſcarce be imagined than the ſailors, when they had ſlipt on the rich Spaniſh habits over their own greaſy cloaths. The Commodore did not begin to approach the town, with the Centurion, 'till there was reaſon to think that his people were landed, and was entertained, in the morning, with the ſight of the Engliſh flag, flying on the fort. Immediately all hands were employed in carrying off to the ſhips the riches of the town; and this was done without interruption: Tho' the Spaniards threatened in high terms, and made a ſhow above the town, as if they intended to recover it by ſtorm. And ſuch was their obſtinate pride, that they rather choſe the Engliſh ſhould burn their houſes, and ſuch commodities as they could not remove, than condeſcend to redeem them at any reaſonable rate; accordingly the whole town was laid in aſhes, except a convent and a church, which Mr. Anſon ordered to be ſpared. This order, and the ſingular humanity and politeneſs with which he treated the priſoners during the whole expedition, are ſhining proofs both of his good nature and ſagacity. For as he had been repreſented as a heretic, a name which, among theſe people, includes every ſpecies of vice and impiety, that is, a monſter, and might have expected to be treated with brutality and cruelty, anſwerable to their conception of him, had he been taken, he thought himſelf under the greater obligation to ſet his priſoners an example of worthier ſentiments, and a nobler conduct. All were treated with lenity, their women with the moſt modeſt reſpect, and the very Monks relented at the courteous deportment of the conquerors, whom they had been uſed to paint in the moſt frightful colours. Nay gratitude carried a Jeſuit ſo far as to put an hypothetical interpretation on that cruel tenet of their church, which excludes all heretics from ſalvation. Thus the name of Mr. Anſon, and, on his account, the name of an Engliſhman, is beloved and reſpected all over America; and harmony, and confidence, will ſoon take place between theſe nations on a peace, of which commerce, mutual wants, and mutual eſteem, ought to be the perpetual cement. [To be continued.]

LONDON, April 12.

This day his Majeſty went to the Houſe of Peers, and made the following moſt gracious ſpeech.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

I Cannot put an end to this ſeſſion of parliament, without returning you my hearty thanks for the zeal and diſpath, which you have gone through the public buſineſs. Nothing could have afforded me more ſatisfaction, than the attention you have given to thoſe eſſential points of our national intereſt, which I earneſtly recommended to you at the opening of the ſeſſion. And it is with the greateſt pleaſure I have now given my aſſent to thoſe laws, which have been the reſult of your prudent deliberations, for advancing the public credit; for promoting the commerce and manufactures of this kingdom; and for encouraging the induſtry of my good ſubjects.

There has been ſo little alteration in the ſtate of affairs abroad, ſince your meeting, that I have ſcarce any thing to add upon that head. My reſolution to adher ſtrictly to the engagements I have enter'd into, and to do every thing in my power to preſerve the peace, which has been ſo happily eſtabliſhed, continues the ſame; and I have received the fulleſt aſſurances from all my allies, of their diſpoſition to promote this great end. My ſincere endeavours ſhall be exerted to cultivate and improve this good diſpoſition, that my own kingdoms, as well as the reſt of Europe, may long enjoy the happy fruits of the preſent tranquillity.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

I thank you in a particular manner, for the ſupplies you have ſo readily granted me; and for the public ſpirit you have ſhewn, in laying hold of the very firſt opportunity to reduce the intereſt of the

the national debt, without the leaſt infringement of parliamentary faith. The ſucceſs which has already attended this wiſe meaſure, is a proof of the preſent credit of this kingdom; and has laid a ſure foundation for the continuance of it; and cannot fail to add ſtrength and reputation to my government both at home and abroad.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

I make no doubt but you will carry into your reſpective countris, the ſame good principles and affections which I have experienced from you here. Let it be your buſineſs to promote peace and harmony; and to ſupport and propagate religion, good manners, and good order, amongſt my people; whoſe true and laſting happineſs ſhall be my conſtant care afrer this.
